PREFACE.

WITHIN the last few years a new impetus has been given to the study of the Sanskrit Language, in consequence of its being placed in the curriculum of the Calcutta University; but Indian students have not yet met with a dictionary to answer their purposes, as the existing Sanskrit dictionaries are too dear and those that are cheap are of no use at all to them. To supply this desideratum and to combine copiousness of information with cheapness of price, I have, under the patronage of the Government N. W. P., without which this work would have never been published, abridged the excellent Dictionary of the late Professor Wilson.

On a careful examination of the work of Professor Wilson, it has been found that his dictionary contains nearly all the words now in use with in the now extant treatises on different branches of Sanskrit learning. Moreover, it contains a great number of compound words, the meaning of which can be understood by knowing the meaning of their component parts. I have rejected such words but have retained those compounds which give a meaning different from that obtained by the combination of the meaning of the component parts. For instance, I have rejected the word gaurāṅgā, since a student, having a knowledge of the formation of different kinds of compounds in Sanskrit, will at once know that the word means 'garment', when he knows that gaurā means 'a horse' and āṅgā means 'produced on'. I have retained the word gaurāṅgā meaning 'mule,' for obvious reasons. I have also rejected words that are formed by the addition of prefix, for a word, if so used in a pleonastic sense. When a word having one of the most common prefixes is not found in this dictionary, it must be taken that either the word has not received any modification in its meaning by the addition of the prefix or that it has received such alteration as is not generally accomplished by the addition of such prefixes. Thus the word śaśāṅgā will be added in the dictionary, since it has no affix forming as the affix tv has had no influence in changing the meaning. I have also omitted a number of words formed by adding such affix as am which is common and universally applied to form particular kinds of words. Again, I have rejected the word दीप्पलता 'softness,' since दीप्प is a common affix that forms abstract nouns. One having some knowledge of Sanskrit grammar, knows that दीप्प 'soft' makes दीप्पलता 'softness' does not need it is necessary to multiply examples of this kind. Words by all other affixes which are neither very common nor universally applied, have been retained. I have not included in this dictionary the names of certain herbs and medicinal plants which are found only in the treatise on Hindu Medicine, a subject, which is seldom read now. A certain number of uncommon terms which are not likely to be found in the Sanskrit books, have also been rejected. The philosophical terms have been scrupulously retained. In fact, my aim has been to be as exact and original.

In the end of the book there is an Appendix containing the common affixes, both Taddhita and Kridanta, with the different senses in which they are used. In the body of the dictionary the sense of the affix is not always given, in the etymology of the words where they occur. Reference to the appendix will clear any doubt that might be felt in the exact sense of the affixes.
